

OPEN LETTER TO NIH DIRECTOR FRANCIS COLLINS

Francis Collins, MD, PhD
Director
National Institutes of Health
Bethesda, MD 20892

Dear Dr. Collins:

We are writing to request that NIH delay implementation of its policy that sweeps basic science into a clinical trials framework until adequate feedback about its impact is obtained from the affected scientific community. We wholeheartedly agree with NIH's goals of increasing scientific transparency and rigor, but we ask that you consider alternative mechanisms to accomplish those goals that would have fewer adverse effects on basic research.

The mission of National Institutes of Health is to fund a wide range of health-related research. Some of this research consists of clinical trials: testing the effects of interventions that could be developed into treatments for improving health. Clinical trials are the key method for establishing the efficacy, and safety, of potential new treatments. The NIH also funds, as part of its mandate, basic discovery science on health-related topics. Basic discovery science tests hypotheses about how human minds and bodies work. History shows that basic science is necessary: the discoveries made by the basic science of today provide the foundation for the clinical trials of tomorrow. New treatments can only be invented on the basis of new knowledge about how the mind and body work.

The NIH's interpretation of its definition of "clinical trials" is so broad that many experiments designed to test hypotheses about how the mind and body work will be inappropriately classified as clinical trials. The negative impact of the new policy is substantial:

- Basic scientists whose research is now deemed a "clinical trial" may only submit applications for funding through a funding opportunity announcement designated specifically for clinical trials, even though other funding vehicles are more appropriate;
- The basic research studies now classified as "clinical trials" will be reviewed by study sections constituted for clinical trial review and would need to be significantly reconstituted to handle discovery science;
- Training grants cannot be used to fund "clinical trials," so basic research involving humans will be ineligible for T-awards;

- Exploratory research, which is the lifeblood of discovery, would be hampered. If exploratory research could be registered at all, such registration is likely to slow the pace of research, impeding innovation and discovery;
- The new policies unnecessarily increase the administrative burden on investigators, and this burden will fall disproportionately on researchers at less well-funded universities and colleges, which have fewer administrative resources to help; and,
- Members of the public who seek information in clinicaltrials.gov will find a potentially confusing array of basic science experiments that are not in the clinical trial stage.

We understand that a motivation for this change is to increase transparency and replicability in NIH funded research. We strongly applaud this motivation. Indeed, many of the undersigned are actively involved in scientist-led efforts to increase replicability and transparency. Examples include the Open Science Framework (OSF), and OpenfMRI. And other efforts to increase transparency are underway, both inside and outside government. NIH has also helped to increase data sharing in the NIMH data archive. And scientists are currently developing mechanisms for more sharing of code as well. We encourage (and applaud the NIH for encouraging) pre-registration, data sharing, protocol sharing, and code sharing.

We support the goals of transparency and replicability. Unfortunately, the current effort to improve transparency and replicability in basic science does so by mislabeled basic research as a clinical trial.

In our view, NIH could easily transform a policy that is harmful to basic science researchers into one that will do no harm and yet increase the transparency and accountability for all of the research it funds, but in parallel tracks.

We respectfully request that you:

- Affirm that health-related discovery science is an important part of the NIH research portfolio that enables us to build a foundation of fundamental knowledge that will be needed, in time, to design clinical trials.
- Take this opportunity to invite to NIH representatives from affected basic research communities, listen to the concerns raised, and work with us to shape a policy for this important segment of NIH grantees; and,
- Specifically develop a protocol for promoting transparency and replicability based on input from the basic science community. A new protocol could be based on existing efforts such as OSF and OpenfMRI.

Sincerely,
